

No Worries, They've Been Fed

So you think you have some workplace hazards, eh?

Consider that you might have to do an occasional job at the well-known Florida theme park and nature conservatory known as the "Alligator Capital of the World."

In this case, on the rear elevation of the main building, the workers had to fit a metal canopy to a steel framework.

One of our valued contributors (thanks, James!) sent this one, taken by a coworker who was on vacation. "The two guys on the ladders stood on the bank and pushed the ladders into the mud at the bottom of the pool," he writes, "then proceeded to fix the covering to the edge of the building."

Presumably those gators are sufficiently small and well-fed so that even if you fell off the scaffold, they'd mind their own business. I'm just glad I won't have to find out.
